The Department of European Languages and Studies focuses on Europe in its geographical, linguistic, historical, literary, artistic, and cultural diversity. Students pursuing studies in the Department build knowledge about a region of the world that has had a defining influence on U.S. cultural and political traditions and continues to exert profound effects on global politics, economies, and cultures today. The territories of Eurasia have always been interconnected, even before individual regions became the fifty nation-states belonging to this continent. Courses in the Department accordingly offer opportunities to gain in-depth awareness of the linguistic, literary, and philosophical traditions of Europe, as well as understanding of their interrelations and of Europe as a complex entity. The European Union that now includes 27 states is only the most recent socio-political and economic realization of the intense cross-pollination of ideas and institutions that has always defined this broad and diverse region. Immigration and the displacement of populations throughout Europe are also historical constants and have long influenced literary and artistic production as well as the European political landscape in ways that many courses in the Department explore. Students can further examine the legacies of European colonial enterprises and their profound impact on the shape of the world in which we live.

Students may earn a Bachelor's degree in European Studies, French, or German Studies. By taking a smaller number of courses, they may complete a minor in European Studies, French, German Studies, Italian Studies, or Russian Studies. Advanced students may begin the Department's Masters degree in European Thought and Culture in their senior year. Language students in the Department become proficient in French, German, Italian, or Russian with particular strengths in the communicative and interpretive aspects of language learning. In studying a new language students can investigate their own native language(s), since the “foreignness” of a foreign language allows them to view in a new light their own linguistic situation. The Department encourages study abroad as a component of the students’ course of study.
